There is a temptation, however, in drafting legislation to deal with the crime of terrorism, to overreact. We must guard against the blind rage that grabs at us when we think of the deaths of 241 marines at the hands of terrorists in Beirut, or of the terrorist bombing of this very building just 4 months ago. We must be careful that any legislation we pass strikes a balance between the need to punish terrorists for their criminal activities, and the constitutional rights of all Americans, especially the right to express dissent.

In my view, my proposed legislation strikes that important balance. It quite simply defines the crime of terrorism, sets forth penalties for its commission, and gives the Federal Bureau of Investigation primary jurisdiction over investigating criminal activities of a terrorist nature.

The last provision, giving jurisdiction to the FBI, is, I believe, essential. We need a focal point, a "central clearing house," as it were, for terrorist investigations. We need to be able to delineate responsibility for investigating rorism; and
